The most basic level of hypermedia is shoving links into the response body (thanks Resources!) but then the client has to do a lot of detective work to figure out what they can do next. In the past folks would just shrug and say "you have a URL and a link relation, that's a good start", but these days there are quite a few popular Hypermedia Formats around which make things a whole lot easier ...

HyperText is a way to link and access information of various kinds as a web of nodes in which the user can browse at will. Potentially, HyperText provides a single user-interface to many large classes of stored information, such as reports, notes, databases, computer documentation and on-line systems help.

Hypertext - Wikipedia

Whenever setData is called, the internal Ketting cache is updated with the new resource state. This is globally stored, based on the uri of the resource. This means that if multiple components use useResource on that same uri, every component will see that update and trigger a re-render.. This is similar to Apollo's local state, except it's still bound to a single resource uri and can ...
